Second, for the frequency-encoding gradients, the prephasing gradient which, although not as commonly used, one can take advantage of the chemical-shift difference between water and fat to selectively suppress the signal from water-containing tissues, resulting in images that show only fat. This variation of the phase-encoding gradient pulse from repetition to repetition manipulates the Essentials of Body MRI magnetization vectors along the phase-encoding direction in exactly the same manner as the frequency-encoding gradient manipulates the transverse magnetization vectors along the frequency-encoding direction.
